Making a Difference

An interactive "Polio Eradication Game" may increase interest in global health, especially among youth, a new study by the School has found. Researchers led by Tolu Okitika (MPH, DEOHS '13), a former intern for the Department of Global Health, set up the game at a free global health fair in Seattle. It's played on a carpeted grid like a life-size chess board. Four players – representing a researcher, transportation expert, local community coordinator and health care worker – must work together to solve outbreaks using limited resources. Surveys showed 77 percent of participants were more interested in global health after playing or watching the game. Judy Wasserheit (GH, Epi) was senior author. Her son, Ash Harris, a student at Digipen Institute of Technology in Redmond, came up with the idea for the game, and helped develop and implement it. Other co-authors included Ruanne Barnabas (GH) and Tessa Rue (Biostat).
